Comparing the effects of acute exercise and cognitive-behavioral therapy on laboratory-based measures of social anxiety. Previous research has shown that cognitive-behavioral therapy (CBT) can be an effective treatment for social anxiety (e.g., Lavan et al., 2004; Mayfield et al., 2005). CBT has also been shown to improve cardiovascular reactivity (Carver et al., 2011), but there have been no comparisons between the effects of CBT and exercise on cardiovascular reactivity. The current study compared the effects of brief exercise and a brief-CBT intervention on cognitive, affective, and autonomic cardiac responses in a sample of 20 individuals with social anxiety. Cardiovascular reactivity was significantly lower following brief exercise, as compared with brief CBT, on all measures. Implications for the use of brief exercise for the treatment of social anxiety are discussed.
